4. It is likely that the system initially will lead to "over-reaction"; that [redacted] will be widely disseminated before proper analysis can be completed. Currently such information frequently is sufficiently "old" by the time it is processed to preclude major concern. The new system also will demand that we do additional work on providing a store of background information for comparative purposes. It is possible that the system may, in fact, require some decentralization of [redacted] placing [redacted] and analysts in closer proximity to take advantage of the new information by turning out timely intelligence reports.
